

Hello friend

I believe I can call you friend because of a link we share through the ages. No, I do not want you to send me money via wire. In fact, I write to give something to you as you are the last.

Let me begin by saying I am an historian. My life's work relates intimately to Germany and the Imperial Knights. These knights were evident in Germany through the 16th Century. Before you throw this letter into the trash, please understand that until a few weeks ago, I had no idea you existed.

As you can see by the card I have attached, I can prove how I found you. I was attending the Texas Renaissance Festival and saw you speaking to an armor maker. I was shocked at how closely you resembled an ancient knight that is part of my studies. I did ask for your name, but no one would tell me your last name.

It was not until I saw your elven companion give a card to a lady in the soap shop that I had an opportunity to find out more. After she left, I asked if I could have the card. The woman wrote down the information and handed it to me. This is how I was able to verify your namesake as well as find out how to contact you. I did so by looking up your business online.

Please forgive my need to remain anonymous. This is two-fold. First of all, I am an older person not used to making quick friends and secondly, I intend to provide to you certain artifacts that, should certain universities find out, there could be consequences. I am an old man and only care about keeping history alive.

This note, by the way, has been hand-delivered to you to help retain my anonymity. Please look at some of the information that I have included about the Imperial Knights. I will be in touch soon.
